 August 30, 2013

Logistics operator, Northline announced yesterday they are building a $24 million, 32,000 square metre transport and logistics facility in Western Sydney.

Located in Smithfield, the facility will provide more than 16,500 square metres of warehousing and freight operations space including a 2,000 square metre all-weather loading and unloading breezeway, and provide easy access to major transport links.

“The improved efficiencies of the site will be of significant benefit to our customers who rely on Northline’s ability to move freight quickly and efficiently through our facilities,” Northline CEO Craige Whitton says.

Whitton says Northline is all about connectivity and the provision of freight solutions to customers across Australia, including those doing business in markets considered too hard for many logistics operators.

“It’s about connecting our customers with their customers seamlessly and no matter the practical challenges.”

Work has already begun and is due for completion by December 2013.
